Hurricane Katrina affects Frogs' siblings

Pond St. Grill changes face to add flavor to TCU dining

Student diversity climbing

SMOOTH REPRESENTATION

SGA implements new system

Tulane students flee to Houston

Tulane students fleed to Houston

Ed Kienholz

Tulane students felt the effects of Hurricane Katrina as it passed through New Orleans and forced family members to evacuate. Ryan Mitsuhoshi, a senior engineering major, spent his weekend arranging hotel reservations because his parents, who live in Connecticut just dropped off his sone at Tulane University for her first year, and she was afraid to get away from the hurricane. Mitsuhoshi's sister, Sharron, a freshman biology major at Tulane, said people gathered in the hallway of her residence hall at 6 p.m. Saturday. They were given instructions to evacuate the campus with their parents, or the university would provide them with transportation.

Shannon said the mother of one of the other girls in her dorm offered rides and opened her house to Houston to any students who needed it. Shannon and two other students took the offer. “I am very thankful the hurricane changed paths,” Shannon said. “A lot of people thought we wouldn’t get to come back to school!”

According to Tulane’s emergency Web site, emergency Web site, the class will resume in Sept. 7.

Ray Brown, dean of admissions.

In addition to this program, TCU also conducted three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, conduct three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, and the Community Scholars Program. The program, which began in 2000 as an international students

Student diversity climbing

Programs attract minority, international students

R. van Knapen

Freshman minority enrollment has hit a record-high this semester at 35.5 percent. University officials attribute the increase to the success of several new programs designed to attract students who are financially disadvantaged, such as the Community Scholars Program.

The program, which began in 2000 as an integration into local area high schools, was designed for disadvantaged students who are first-generation American or college students. The Community Scholars Program is the jewel in the diversity crown here at TCU, said Roy Brown, dean of admissions.

In addition to this program, TCU also conducts three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, Camp College and the National Hispanic Institute. To implement these programs, Brown said his philosophy to high schools was, “Give us your best and brightest, and we’ll take care of them.”

Brown said 10 students received full scholarships in 2000, but with the growing number of applicants, TCU has lowered the amount of the scholarships in order to spread out the money.

By ERICA MAREZ

Tulane students felt the effects of Hurricane Katrina as it passed through New Orleans and forced family members to evacuate. Ryan Mitsuhoshi, a senior engineering major, spent his weekend arranging hotel reservations because his parents, who live in Connecticut just dropped off his son at Tulane University for her first year, and she was afraid to get away from the hurricane. Mitsuhoshi's sister, Sharron, a freshman biology major at Tulane, said people gathered in the hallway of her residence hall at 6 p.m. Saturday. They were given instructions to evacuate the campus with their parents, or the university would provide them with transportation.

Shannon said the mother of one of the other girls in her dorm offered rides and opened her house to Houston to any students who needed it. Shannon and two other students took the offer. “I am very thankful the hurricane changed paths,” Shannon said. “A lot of people thought we wouldn’t get to come back to school!”

According to Tulane’s emergency Web site, emergency Web site, the class will resume in Sept. 7.

Ray Brown, dean of admissions.

In addition to this program, TCU also conducted three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, conduct three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, and the Community Scholars Program. The program, which began in 2000 as an international students

Student diversity climbing

Programs attract minority, international students

R. van Knapen

Freshman minority enrollment has hit a record-high this semester at 35.5 percent. University officials attribute the increase to the success of several new programs designed to attract students who are financially disadvantaged, such as the Community Scholars Program.

The program, which began in 2000 as an integration into local area high schools, was designed for disadvantaged students who are first-generation American or college students. The Community Scholars Program is the jewel in the diversity crown here at TCU, said Roy Brown, dean of admissions.

In addition to this program, TCU also conducts three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, Camp College and the National Hispanic Institute. To implement these programs, Brown said his philosophy to high schools was, “Give us your best and brightest, and we’ll take care of them.”

Brown said 10 students received full scholarships in 2000, but with the growing number of applicants, TCU has lowered the amount of the scholarships in order to spread out the money.

By ERICA MAREZ

Tulane students felt the effects of Hurricane Katrina as it passed through New Orleans and forced family members to evacuate. Ryan Mitsuhoshi, a senior engineering major, spent his weekend arranging hotel reservations because his parents, who live in Connecticut just dropped off his son at Tulane University for her first year, and she was afraid to get away from the hurricane. Mitsuhoshi's sister, Sharron, a freshman biology major at Tulane, said people gathered in the hallway of her residence hall at 6 p.m. Saturday. They were given instructions to evacuate the campus with their parents, or the university would provide them with transportation.

Shannon said the mother of one of the other girls in her dorm offered rides and opened her house to Houston to any students who needed it. Shannon and two other students took the offer. “I am very thankful the hurricane changed paths,” Shannon said. “A lot of people thought we wouldn’t get to come back to school!”

According to Tulane’s emergency Web site, emergency Web site, the class will resume in Sept. 7.

Ray Brown, dean of admissions.

In addition to this program, TCU also conducted three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, conduct three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, and the Community Scholars Program. The program, which began in 2000 as an international students

Student diversity climbing

Programs attract minority, international students

R. van Knapen

Freshman minority enrollment has hit a record-high this semester at 35.5 percent. University officials attribute the increase to the success of several new programs designed to attract students who are financially disadvantaged, such as the Community Scholars Program.

The program, which began in 2000 as an integration into local area high schools, was designed for disadvantaged students who are first-generation American or college students. The Community Scholars Program is the jewel in the diversity crown here at TCU, said Roy Brown, dean of admissions.

In addition to this program, TCU also conducts three summer programs for prospective minority students: Absolute Xcellence, Camp College and the National Hispanic Institute. To implement these programs, Brown said his philosophy to high schools was, “Give us your best and brightest, and we’ll take care of them.”

Brown said 10 students received full scholarships in 2000, but with the growing number of applicants, TCU has lowered the amount of the scholarships in order to spread out the money.